(4) The parent (with his private CRLF) takes over as a closing tag. So for a CRLF to be inserted, we need a space after the last CRLF, an HTML text before that (so the space needs to be counted as a CRLF), and a closing tag after that. That means that having is not going to work. Actually, the HTML specification has a whole section on this problem and suggests looking at the next issue. The HTML specification says that if there are more than two CRLFs in a row, they should be replaced by a space, and the first one of those spaces should be included in the next CDATA section. I'm not sure whether that helps with some or all browsers. The fix for your issue is to make sure the image (or the other element that ends up with a CRLF) has an end tag. If the image is the last element in the first paragraph, then you can also wrap the first paragraph in a CDATA section. The CDATA section will tell browsers not to interpret the following content in any way: image.png image2.png]> The preferred height for a
